Land Banking is simply the process of securing future property development sites today, at the current price. Many large property development companies buy Greenfield sites, farms or large tracts of land and put them in their "land bank" to ensure they have a sufficient stock of land for future property developments.

Land Banking: Property Development Strategy Of The Pros

I would do it properly so that what you own is reflected in your deeds in case you sell or have any dispute over the land in the future. If your neighbour sells and the new owner has an issue, I'm not sure what good a contract between you and the farmer would be if the land change is not reflected in his deeds - what your new neighbour thought he bought wouldn't be quite "all there" so to speak.
